Not illustrated. 1857 Excerpt: . . . one has failed to render me insensible to his cracked voice, and the other to his crooked eyes Unquestionably not! cried Bobadil in high glee, vain fops and fools they are all of them. But does it never happen that there turns up one among all your admirers without such disqualifying attributes as you describe I am afraid, mistress Willy-nilly, that though doubtless very merciful, you may be a trifle too difficult to please. Did you never chance to turn your eyes round, --as you say that young maidens are forbidden to do, --and find that they lighted upon something to your taste Come now, speak out, never mind confessing to me that you have looked a little high I and Bobadil chuckled, and settled himself into his fine clothes with a waggish air. I might certainly make such a confession to you better than to...
