Excerpt: .When these dyes appear on wool or silk fabrics they should be laundered with neutral soap and warm water, the standard process recommended by the Department of Chemical Engineering of the Laundry owners National Association. Therefore, if the recommendations of this Department are carried out the trouble experienced with this class of dyes will be reduced to a minimum. It has been stated earlier in this chapter that one dyestuff may be listed under more than one class-heading, according to the method of application used and the affinity that the dyestuff exhibits for the fiber under the existing conditions. Some of the dyestuffs, notably the basic dyestuffs, that under the conditions described for direct dyes are not fast on the vegetable fibers become exceedingly fast and desirable when the fabric is given a mordanting treatment before dyeing. A mordant is a material that reacts with the dye to form an insoluble compound; when a fabric, with which no reaction occurs by direct dyeing, is first impregnated with a mordant and then treated with the dye, the insoluble compound is formed on the fabric. The mordants used in the application of these dyes are albumin; acids and acid salts, which include the iron, aluminum and chromium salts of the strong acids (hydrochloric and sulfuric). The mordant used often has a decided effect on the color produced; for instance, alizerine gives a red color with aluminum mordant and a purple color with an iron mordant, while...
