It is simply a complete telegraph system, intimately connecting every portion of the anatomy. In structure it is a series of tubular membranes containing in a minute and continuous stream, matter identical with the brain substance, through which electrical energy is transmitted. This energy is of two kinds, galvanic and faradic. The first is generated by the digestive organs, and is constant; the second, is an intermittent current generated by molecular friction throughout the body. The nervous system is divided into two classes, the cerebrospinal or animal, and the sympathetic or organic. There are two currents of nerve force. The afferent, from the peripheral parts to the nerve centers, and the efferent, from the nerve centers to the peripheral parts. The brain is the chief nerve center. All force is sent there, and thence distributed in every direction and in such proportions as conditions require. To do this the brain gives off twelve pairs of cranial nerves and the spinal cord, the latter being the grand trunk line which supplies the minor centers, or plexuses, in the body.
