AFTER having, in a summary manner, reviewed the historical connection existing between the Roman and Mohammedan laws, and examined the social condition of their respective people, we now come to our last theme, namely, the comparison of their laws proper, which will show their similarity in more than one point. This examination--which will be preceded by an explanation of jurisprudence in both systems and an attempt to show the likeness of their respective jurisconsults--will be limited to certain subjects of personal law and contracts, and concluded with a few observations on judicial organization. JURISPRUDENCE Jurisprudence, according to the Roman conception, is the knowledge of divine and human things; it is the science of the just and the unjust. 185 This definition has been severely criticised by various writers as not giving the exact idea of jurisprudence, and a distinguished English jurist went...
